THE QUIET LITTLE DRUM

Created by Hamidreza Rostami

In the great orchestra of Mr. Harmony’s music shop,
every instrument had a voice.

The trumpet blasted.
The violin sang.
The piano tinkled.
The cymbals crashed.
And then there was Drum.

Drum was small and round,
with a smooth wooden body
and a soft leatther top.
He loved music. He loved rhythm.
He loved the way the other instruments made the air dance.

But Drum had a secret.
He could not make a sound.

“Why do you not play with us?” asked Violin, her strings humming.

"Of course you can!" said Trumpet, blasting a loud note.
"Just hit your top!"
Drum tried. He tried hard.
But no sound came out.

“Maybe you are broken,”
said Piano, her keys
clicking softly.
Drum’s heart sank.
“Maybe I am.”

He rolled into a quiet corner of the shop, where the dust gathered and the light was dim.

One day, a little girl named Lily came into the shop. She had soft brown hair and curious eyes.

She walked around, looking at all the instruments.
She listened to the trumpet's blast.
She admired the violin's shine.
She tapped the piano's keys.
Then she saw Drum.

"What is this?" Lily asked,
picking up Drum.
"That is just Drum," said Mr. Harmony.
"He does not work."

But Lily did not put Drum down.
She held him close and looked at him carefully.
“I think he is beautiful,” she said.

Lily took Drum home.
She set him on her bed
and talked to him like
he was her best friend.

“You are going to be my special drum,” she said. “Even if you cannot make noise, you can still be with me.”
Drum felt warm inside.
No one had ever talked to him
like that before.

One night, as Lily slept,
Drum heard a sound.
A soft, sad sound. It was coming from outside.
A little kitten was mewing,
lost and scared.

Drum wanted to help.
But how? He could not make noise to call for help.
Then Drum had an idea.
He rolled to the window and began to tap. Not on his top.
On the glass. Tap. Tap. Tap.

Lily woke up. She heard the soft tapping and saw Drum at the window. She looked outside and saw the kitten. She opened the window and brought the kitten inside.

Lily hugged Drum.
“Thank you, Drum,” she said.
“You helped me find the kitten!”
Then she held Drum close to her ear and whispered, “Maybe you are meant to be quiet.”
And then Drum heard it.
The softest sound, like a heartbeat.
It was his sound.

Drum lives in Mr. Harmony’s music shop,
where every instrument has a voice.
Every instrument except Drum.

When a lost kitten calls in the night,
the littlest drum in the shop finds
a way to help without making a single loud sound.

A gentle story about kindness, patience,
and discovering that the most important sounds are the ones you have to listen very carefully to hear.

Created by Hamidreza Rostami