THE LITTLE CLOUD WHO WANTED TO RAIN

Created by Hamidreza Rostami

High above the world, where the air was thin
and the sun tickled his edges, lived a little cloud named Nimbus.

Nimbus was soft and round, with a silvery glow that shimmered like a pearl.
But unlike the other clouds,
Nimbus never let go.

‘Don’t be silly,’ said Cumulus, the big fluffy cloud beside him. ‘Letting go is what we do!’

Cumulus puffed up his chest and sent a happy shower down to the fields below.
The flowers stretched up to drink,
and the children laughed
in the puddles.

Nimbus squeezed himself smaller.
‘But what if I disappear?
What if I’m not a cloud anymore?’

Stratus, the long gray cloud, chuckled.
“You won’t disappear,
little one.
You’ll just become something new.”

That night, as the stars began to twinkle, Nimbus watched the others change.

Cirrus painted streaks across the sunset.
Cumulus became a great white castle.

And Nimbus?
Nimbus stayed the same.
Small. Round. Afraid.

The next morning,
Nimbus heard a sound.
A tiny, sad sound.

‘Below, in a little garden,
a small sparrow with a bandaged wing looked up.
‘Please,’ she whispered.
‘We need rain.’

Nimbus’s heart ached.
He wanted to help.
But his edges trembled.

The wind sighed.
‘Sometimes, little cloud,
you have to let go
to hold on to what matters.’

‘Nimbus took a deep breath.
He thought of the sparrow’s sad eyes.
And then... he let go.’

One tiny drop.
Then another.
Then a hundred.
The rain was soft at first.
Gentle. Like a secret between friends.

The sparrow chirped happily.
The flowers lifted their heads.
The soil drank deeply.

The sun came out and turned Nimbus into a beautiful rainbow.
‘You’re beautiful!’
said Cumulus.

And if you look up at the sky
after a rain and see a rainbow smiling down...
maybe that is Nimbus, saying hello.

Nimbus is a little cloud who loves floating in the sky, but he is terrified of raining. While all the other clouds joyfully water the world below, Nimbus holds himself together tightly, afraid he will disappear.

When he sees a thirsty garden and a sad little sparrow, Nimbus discovers that letting go does not mean disappearing. It means becoming part of something beautiful.

A heartwarming bedtime story about courage, kindness, and the joy of giving.

Created by Hamidreza Rostami