THE DAY THE COLORS RAN AWAY

Created by Hamidreza Rostami

Milo loved colors.
He loved the red of strawberries,
the blue of the sky,
the green of the grass,
and especially the yellow
of his favorite crayon.

One morning, Milo woke up and something was... wrong.

The world was gray.
Not just a little gray.
Completely, totally,
absolutely gray.

The sky was gray.
The trees were gray.
Even Milo's red pajamas were ... gray.
"That's strange," Milo said,
poking his pajamas.
"They were red yesterday."

Milo ran downstairs.
“Mom! Dad!
The colors are gone!”

His parents looked up from their gray breakfast. “What do you mean, honey?” Mom asked.

Milo held up his crayon box.
All the crayons were gray.
“The colors ran away!”

‘Milo’s dad checked the TV.
It was gray.
Mom looked out the window. Gray.
“This is odd,” Dad said.

Milo grabbed his backpack.
“I’m going to find them!”

Milo stepped outside.
The world looked like an old movie.
No red stop signs.
No green grass.
No blue sky. Just gray.

Then he heard it.
A soft giggle.

He followed the sound to the park. And there, sitting on a gray swing, was a small, round figure.

It was Red. The color red, in the shape of a little person with rosy cheeks and a bright red dress.
“Hello, Milo,” Red said,
swinging her legs.
“Looking for us?”

‘Yes!’ Milo said.
‘Where are all the colors?
The world is so...
boring without you!’

Red giggled.
“We just wanted a day off.
Being a color is hard work,
you know.”

Red hopped off the swing.
‘Come on. I’ll show you.’
She took Milo’s hand and led him to a clearing in the park.

There, Milo saw them all.
Blue was napping under a tree.
Green was reading a book.
Yellow was eating a gray sandwich.

“We just needed a break,” said Blue, yawning. “Being everywhere all the time is exhausting.”
Green nodded. “And no one appreciates us. They just expect us to be there.”

One morning Milo wakes up and discovers that every color in the world has disappeared. Everything is gray, even his favorite red pajamas.

So Milo sets out to find the colors, and learns that they simply wanted a day off.

A warm story about noticing the beauty around us, and never taking it for granted.

Created by Hamidreza Rostami