THE LITTLE LIBRARY OF LOST THINGS

At the end of Maple Street, between the bakery and the flower shop, stood a little library. It was not like other libraries. This one was small and cozy, with a red door and a chimney that always had smoke curling it. And it had a special sign.

Inside, Ms. Willow kept the library.
She had kind eyes,
a warm smile, and a special gift.

She could hear the stories of lost things.
Not the stories in books.
But the stories of the things themselves.

One day, a little boy named Sam came into the library. He looked sad and worried.

"I lost my favorite toy car," he said. "It was red and fast, and I loved it so much."

Ms. Willow smiled. "Let us see if we can find it a story to tell."

Ms. Willow led Sam to a shelf filled with lost toys. There were dolls, balls, stuffed animals, and yes, cars.

She picked up a small, red toy car. “Is this yours?”
Sam’s eyes lit up. “Yes! That is my car!”

But then Sam hesitated.
“But how did it get here?”

Ms. Willow placed the car in Sam’s hand. “Every lost thing has a story. Would you like to hear yours?” Sam nodded.

Ms. Willow closed
her eyes and listened.
Then she began to speak.

“Your car did not want to be lost. It rolled down the sidewalk, turned the corner, even tried to climb a hill. Sam giggled. “A car cannot climb a hill!” Ms. Willow smiled. “This one tried. For you.”

“It rolled all the way to the park,” Ms. Willow continued. “And there, it met a little girl who had lost her doll. The car told the doll about you, and the doll told the car to keep going.”

Sam’s eyes were wide.
“My car talked to a doll?”

Ms. Willow nodded. “Lost things help each other. They know what it is like to be away from home.”

“Your car rolled all the way here to the library,” Ms. Willow said. “I did not find it. It found its way here, because it wanted to come home to you.” And Sam hugged his car very tight.

Word spread about the Little Library of Lost Things. More children came, looking for their lost treasures. A girl named Mia found her missing sock. A boy named Jake found his key.

One day, a little girl named Emily came in. She looked very sad. “I lost my best friend,” she said. “Not a toy. A real friend. She moved away.”

Ms. Willow thought for a moment. Then she took Emily to a special shelf. On it was a small wooden box with a beautiful carving on the top. “This is the Friendship Box. It helps friends stay connected, even when they are far apart.”

Ms. Willow opened the box. Inside were two small, matching stones. “Take one stone,” Ms. Willow said. “And give the other to your friend. As long as you both have a stone, you will always be connected.”

Emily wrote a letter to her friend, and Ms. Willow mailed it with the second stone inside. Now every time Emily holds her stone, she feels a little closer to her friend.

At the end of Maple Street there is a small library with a red door, kept by Ms. Willow, who can hear the stories of lost things.

When Sam loses his favourite red toy car, Ms. Willow has a story to tell him. And when Emily loses something no shelf can hold, she finds something better.

A warm story about kindness, listening, and discovering that every lost thing has a story, and every story deserves to be heard.
