THE TINY GIANT

Created by Hamidreza Rostami

Pip was small. Very small.
So small that he could hide behind a single blade of grass.
So small that a raindrop
could give him a bath.

So small that the other forest
creatures often forgot he was there.
But Pip did not mind being small.
In fact, Pip thought he was a giant.

“I am Pip the Giant!”
he would declare,
standing on top
of a pebble.

The squirrels would giggle.
“You’re not a giant, Pip.
You’re the smallest creature
in the forest!”
The rabbits would laugh.
“A giant? You’re smaller than my foot!”

But Pip just smiled.
“You’ll see,” he would say.
“One day, I’ll do something so big, so giant, that everyone will know I’m a giant too!”

One day, a great wind
blew through the forest.
It was strong and wild,
and it knocked down many things.

A bird’s nest fell from a tree.
A family of mice lost their home.
A little fox’s favorite play area
was covered in branches.
The forest creatures were sad and worried.

Pip saw the trouble.
He knew he had to help.
But he was so small.
What could he do?
Then he had an idea.
A giant idea.

He scurried to the center of the forest, where
the biggest tree stood.
At the base of the tree
was a hole, just the right size for Pip.

Pip squeezed into the hole and began to dig. He dug and dug, making the hole bigger and deeper.

"What are you doing, Pip?" asked a squirrel, peeking in.

"I'm making a new home!" Pip said.

The other creatures watched as Pip worked. He was small,
but he was fast.
And he did not stop.

Soon, the hole was big enough for the mice family.
They moved in, safe and warm.
But Pip was not done.

He climbed the tree.
For Pip, it was like climbing a mountain.
High above, he found
the bird's nest,
tangled in branches.

Pip carefully climbed to the nest.
He used his small, nimble paws
to untangle it, then carried it piece by piece
to a safer branch.

The birds chirped happily as they settled into their repaired nest.
Pip climbed down and saw the fox, still looking sad near the pile of branches.

“What is wrong?” Pip asked.
“My favorite play area is all covered,” the fox said.
“I cannot play hide and seek anymore.”

Pip looked at the branches.
They were big and heavy.
Much bigger than him.
But Pip had an idea.

He gathered all the small creatures,
and together they moved the branches.
It took a long time, but at last
the play area was clear.
“You may be small,” said the oldest squirrel,
“but you have the heart of a giant.”

Pip is the smallest creature in the whole forest. So of course he tells everyone he is a giant.

When a great wind knocks down nests and homes, tiny Pip sets out to do something truly enormous.

A warm story about kindness, courage, and discovering that being big has nothing to do with size.

Created by Hamidreza Rostami